The new generation gamma ray TeV Cherenkov telescopes observe many astrophysical objects that are far enough for TeV gamma rays to be absorbed in the infrared background. We discuss this phenomenon and the possibility for electromagnetic cascading that may create bumps in the gamma ray spectra. The interaction of ultra high energy protons on the infrared backgrounf with the production of cosmogenic neutrinos will be also discussed.