The biases of theorists have shaped the experiments at the LHC, and have influenced the experimental studies that have been done to test the detectors' capabilities. This may not be a problem. But in the last few months before the LHC begins taking data, it may be wise for us to consider that nature might not share those biases, and to explore how the phenomenology at the LHC might differ from what is typically expected.